Color Psychology in Advertising

In this current modern era, advertising has several types of techniques used to attract consumers to a product or service. The most commonly used techniques are those involving human psychology that gives a touch to the heart but gives high impact. According to Orana Velarde (Visme.com, 2016), marketing a product or service by touching emotions or memories related to sentimental issues to consumers can remind personal information about them when associating with the product or service, which shares about importance and benefits of the product or service. Successful advertisements can appeal to consumers and create a sense of normalcy and encourage potential users to be attracted to them so that they buy or create something that is shared within the advertisement.

Most advertisements and campaigns of a product or service use one of several popular and effective techniques, and some of them are techniques that use human psychological learning (Tara Kimball, 2018). In addition, some advertisements use direct sales techniques that inform consumers and potential consumers directly about the products or services offered. That way, users will get information directly and consistently with a user-friendly understanding.
However, visual advertising plays a role in attracting potential users by teasing the soul, fantasy or personality of the target audience or campaign. There are several techniques used, and one of them is color psychology.

Color psychology technique in advertising gives impact psychologically for humans since having eyesight is one of the important senses, influencing the behavior and any decision-making. According to Lindsay Kolowich (Hubspot.com, 2017), different types of color can give buyers and audiences different perspectives on how to give a reaction and gain their attention to an advertisement. Colors do present in the background, in the typography, in the photography, in branding and also visualizations so it is important to portray the exact color palette according to a targeted audience and the purpose of the advertisement because one single wrong tone used could end up giving the wrong emotion to potential buyers.

The use of bright and meaningful colors is the first example. This technique is used all the time, in every type of visual marketing. Color psychology advertising techniques are easy to understand. Creative advertising relies on attractive color schemes to send wordless messages. Simple options like using bold colors (for example the color red) can attract users' attention to click on the advertisement. Sometimes a color in a brand is so important that it becomes its own identity, such as Coca-Cola in red and white or Tiffany in turquoise blue. The advertisement below uses the Tiffany brand colors and black and white images to complement.

In conclusion, the use of colors to capture and engage emotions in advertising is very important for marketing today although it can be tuned depending on one's personal preferences. Successful branding will always utilize color studies to gain attention from targeted audiences. The advertisements that succeed in boosting the market for a service or product are from companies that value the opinion of consumers to draw attention from new ones to try to give the company loyalty.
