There is life in objects, meaning in numbers, and humour in names and faces.

Jalil Lob

Since childhood I have been baffled by the power of the mind, and despite a fair amount of familiarity with the subject, I am nowhere near being less bewildered by its prowess and power. Hidden within the lobes of the brain are powerful features that include the ability to resolve the intractable, the facility to imagine the unimaginable, and the capacity to recall the forgotten; and much more. So the opportunity to attend a workshop on the 5th and the 6th of March by a 'brain practitioner' who happened to be a champion on the power to recall large chunks of numbers was quickly grabbed.

When the workshop came, the participants in the Masters of Accountancy seminar room were not disappointed. The techniques taught seemed easy enough.

Participants learnt that there is life in objects, that there is meaning in numbers, and that there is humour in names and faces. To remember objects one must put life into the objects, to memorize numbers one has to put words into them and to recall names of faces one has to evoke humour surrounding the names and faces.

The facilitator, Mr Anant, was indeed like an ant busily prompting and prodding the participants to respond like children to his novel techniques. Shy and hesitant at the beginning, it did not take too long for the mood to change as 30 and 40-something 'children' responded excitedly to the beck and call of the facilitator. An amusing sight to say the least! If having fun is true learning, then, indeed much true learning took place during the sessions. But the true test of learning is in its outcome, the ability to make functional what is learnt.

If, after the workshop one is unable to memorise and remember a reasonable number of objects, numbers, names and faces of people one encounters every day, the knowledge acquired over two days of learning and laughter will remain a mere dim memory of an unforgettable moment. Kudos must go to the Pengarah for making the learning opportunity possible.
