ABSTRACT

Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) has become more important to the Malaysian economic. This paper will observe the performance of FDI in Malaysia by examining the significant relationship between FDI with the chosen dependent variables that is Growth Domestic Product (GDP), interest rate, foreign exchange rate and export. The data of stated variables are taken from the Data Stream between the periods of 2001 to 2009. This research study used Least Squares Method as the method of analysis and the findings are explained using the Single Linear Regression. This research study suggests that there is a significant positive relationship between FDI with GDP and export. While, there is a significant negative relationship between FDI with both interest rate and foreign exchange rate. Overall, all dependent variables used in this research report have an effect on the condition of FDI in Malaysia, either increasing or decreasing in performance.

Key words: FDI, GDP, interest rate, foreign exchange rate, export
