PRAYERS FOR NANI (PART 1)

Che Faridah Che Mahmood

Wednesday, 9th July Afternoon

I was deeply absorbed in marking my students' assignment when a message suddenly flashed across my screen. I glanced at it without much thought – until the words sank in. "Allahu…" I gasped aloud. What has gone wrong? The question struck in my mind as I read the message again, heart sinking with every line.

"Please keep Nani in your prayers. She underwent a caesarian section this morning. Shortly after delivery, she experienced complications – cardiac arrest for 31 minutes and internal bleeding, which required a hysterectomy. She is now unconscious in ICU"

The last time I met her was in late May. I had just found out she was pregnant and mentioned it to her. Her response was lively and cheerful: "Dah nak masuk lapan bulan, Pn. "Che"—she was already in her eighth month. I felt a pang of guilt. How could I have missed it? I hadn't meant to be careless or unobservant – I simply thought she had gained a little weight. I never imagined she was far along.

The next update came at 9:20 p.m.—a message from her husband, forwarded to one of our colleagues. It shared the latest update on her condition. The surgery to control the bleeding had gone as planned but the bleeding still had not stopped. She was on a full course of medications, with continuous blood transfusions being administered. Yet she remained unconscious in the ICU – still critical, and fighting for her life.

I stared blankly at the message; my mind was struggling to process it. More messages followed, each one filled with prayers and well-wishes for her recovery. Tears began to roll down my cheeks. I could not hold them back. What broke me most was the thought of her children and the tiny newborn who had just entered the world. What would become of them if she never woke up? Ting!... Ting! ... Ting! Notifications kept buzzing in until midnight, but by then, I had already fallen into an uneasy sleep.

Thursday, 10th July – morning

The latest message shattered me and colleagues completely – Nani was in a critical condition. The doctor had been clear – if the oxygen machine were removed, she would not survive. But leaving it on came with its own grim consequences: one by one, her organs were beginning to fail. Even if they managed to revive her after CPR, the chances of her returning to a normal life were almost nonexistent. At best, she might live – but she would not be the same again. Paralysis was a likely outcome. Paralysis? The word felt too heavy, too cruel to accept. I could imagine her just hours before the delivery, she had been full of life – smiling, waving to the children, and reassuring them gently. "Mommy will see you soon."

Everyone was deeply concerned and kept urging one another to continue praying for Nani. Some suggested reaching out to anyone who might know someone in Mecca – to ask for prayers from the Holy Land. That was exactly what I knew there was not much I could do for Nani in her condition, but I held on to the hope that my efforts, no matter how small, might mean something. So, I contacted a friend in Mecca, along with a few Ustaz. No matter what the doctors had said, never lose hope for miracles could still happen, In Shaa ALLAH.

Initially, I wasn't particularly close to Nani. Nearly two decades my junior and from a different faculty made irregular interaction unlikely – unless we happened to meet in the Common Room (CR), our shared lecturer's lounge. I usually popped in only to make coffee and rarely lingered – unless I bumped into someone I needed to speak with.

Our connection grew stronger through a project grant under the Pusat Inkubator Spa and Sauna (PIKSS) at UiTM Johor. When our team was awarded two grants, we worked closely together to bring to fruition. It was during this time that I really came to know the woman behind the cheerful smile: an entrepreneurial spirit with remarkable dedication and a natural flair for business. At first, I mistook her for Kelantanese, as she often wore a string of gold bracelets and rings on both hands – a style that is quite typical of Kelantanese businesswomen. With her bubbly, happy-go-lucky personality, it was no surprise she attracted a wide circle of customers and friends. Of course, this was all complemented by her unforgettable home-baked banana cakes; I had been one of her loyal regulars long before we ever collaborated.
