Special thanks would like to be given to our interviewees who took time off and helped us with gathering information in regards to the issue besides giving us an inside view on the situation on the ground in Malaysia. Without their specific contribution in terms of knowledge, we would not have come this far in completing this research paper.

Not to forget the staff of Universiti Teknologi MARA's Law Faculty who have been very much helpful in ensuring all of our formal letters and appointments were ready on time. We would like to also mention the staff of Perpustakaan Tun Abdul Razak 2, Universiti Teknologi MARA for their courteous advice and suggestion in research for the areas that we covered. And last but not least, all of our friends who act as peer mentors for our research paper. Once again, thank you to all involved in making the project a success.

ABSTRACT

The topic of our research is Vagrants: Looking at the Law and Social Impact in Malaysia. Beggars have always existed in the world and they are also here in Malaysia. People result in begging as they have no other means or do not bother to seek other means to look for money.

Beggars are always misunderstood and the law enforcers refuse to engage with this class of persons as they do not really commit any crimes. However, the lack of engagement leads to more problems and undetected crimes such as human trafficking. This is something that could be avoided if all parties to the issue play a part.

The topic seeks to venture into the problem of beggars that is advent in Malaysia where there is clear evidence that this problem has not been tackled. We believe that the law could be better in terms of dealing with this group of persons as they are also citizens of our country. Even if they are not, at least the current law must be enforced properly to ensure that the problem faced by beggars and the society could be reduced.
