Last but not least, the chapter summary is concluding the layout of this chapter.

1.1 Background of Study

Brands and brand management have spread far beyond the traditional view of consumer-goods marketers. Brands are increasingly important for companies in almost every industry because of the explosion of choices in almost every area. A brand is emotional, has personality and captures the hearts and mind of consumer. Great brands survive attacks from competitors and market trends because of the strong connections with their customers. Bedbury (2002), stated that branding is about taking something common and improving upon it in ways that make it more valuable and meaningful.

In business-to-business (B2B), branding is not designated as relevant. Many managers believed that it is a phenomenon restricted only to consumer products and market. Robinson et al., (1967), stated that at first, branding was not considered important in B2B marketing. According to Hague and Jackson (1994), branding is often misunderstood and disregarded as creating the illusion that a product or service is better than the brand itself since it is an intangible concept. There is another branding myth is the statement that brand is only a name and logo. However, brand is more than that in terms of brand is a promise and it shows the totality of perception. Other than that, brand holds a distinctive position in customer minds based on past experiences, associations and future expectations and lastly, brand is a shortcut of attributes, benefits, beliefs and values that can distinguish, reduce complexity and simplify the decision-
