Background of study

Distributions of power are a natural process happen every day in an organization (Haugard & Clegg, 2012). Power is the ability of a person to influence other person (Nelson & Quick, 2012). There are two types of power identified in organizational power which are consist of reward, legitimate, and coercive and also personal power consist of expert, and referent (Lunenburg, 2012).

As for this study, the researcher only focused on two types of organizational power which are legitimate power and reward power. Organizational Power means that the action that is taken by someone in the organization that will influence the behavior or benefits of the workers or staff that is working in the organization (Robinson & Bennett, 1997).
